Organizer's Edge ▶

Black and Jews

On my "organizer's edge," is an attempt to bring Blacks and Jews together to achieve common social justice goals. One of an organizer's jobs is to get people together to do what they can't do by themselves. This is often the definition I use when asked what organizers do.

Then it gets complicated. Even among people of similar race, class, and political outlook, differences of all sorts will interfere with the unity necessary to achieve a group's goals. Two specific groups in the US, Blacks and Jews, share similar social justice goals. As Milton Himmelfarb, a Jewish sociologist remarked, "Jews earn like Episcopalians and vote like Puerto Ricans."

But joining the power of the two groups for common goals, especially on a local level, presents many obstacles: chief among them is an aspect of "modern racism" that Visions-Inc founder, Valerie Batts, PhD, calls "avoidance of contact." The avoidance of contact is not so much personal and intentional but rather the result of decades of racial discrimination in housing, jobs and education. The differences in income, education and assets between Black and Jews, and other white people, are wide. They travel in different universes.

Their experience in America is vastly different. As Letty Cottin Pogrebin describes, "To blacks, America is the nation that enslaved them and continues to deny them opportunities. To Jews, it is a promised land that made good on its promises. Blacks worry that their (bad) situation will never improve....Jews worry our (good) situation will not last..." (see "Blacks and Jews: Different Kinds of Survival ," in Bridges and Boundaries, African Americans and American Jews, edited by Jack Salzman, 1992)

Where I live in Boston, like many metropolitan areas, most Blacks and Jews live distant from each other. Read on..
